

The Ultimate Warfare

"First everyone starts to call you youngster. Then they call you uncle, and finally they start to call you old school" These were the words of an older friend who died in prison after serving thirty eight years on his life sentence. With these words in mind I now fully understand the message behind his statement. The physical part of incarceration is tolerable because us humans can naturally adapt to a different environment.

However, the ultimate warfare is the mental side of confinement. From being away from your family to dealing with the buffoonery of everyday prison life. Personally, I have to deal with knowing I'm really innocent. See this system is made to dismantle your mind and make us into true savages. Prisoners can't depend on the system to make them a better individual.

The only way one will get out a better person than they were before entering is to self educate their self. Stay away from the stupidity that surrounds us everyday and focus on their personal agenda. The solution is to not seek outward for guidance, but to go inward. Because our best friend and our worst enemy will most likely be ourself.
