

PRISON - My CULTURE

Describing the culture that I live in now could be most defined as dysfunctional. There are so many different personalities with many different cultural backgrounds that have all taken many different walks of life that has led them here. Even on the best of days, being in the best of moods, with the best of approaches, one may be misinterpreted, and all hell break loose. It is absolutely unimaginable to try and make it through one full day without being tangled up in another's unforetold emotional distress. People within this shadowed society are all just trying to reach the inevitable end of each day without total chaos reaching out to them as they watch others be consumed. As peaceful, calm, and forgiving as it may seem while looking in, trust and believe that things are not always the way they appear, and these moments, viewed from the outside, have often come at a great cost to one, or many, of my culture!
