Ex slaveship sailor turned abolitionist was first to write a bout slavetrade from perspective of common sailor. "No, you'll not get the true story from them, those with material intrests in slavetrade could never be trusted to tell the truth about it." — James Field Stanfield 1789

AKA - Criminal Justice, Prison Industrial Complex. Sunshine is the best disinfectant, but filth grows in the dark, telltail paper leads to a bank, from high office swoop birds upon trail of breadcrumbs, profit turns a blind eye, ships sail out of sight, the tree falls without sound in a still forest, prisons spring up in wilderness, its walls muffle shrieks of dying civil libertys. Sailors had tough lives on the seas. So in port they indulged wildly with liquor, women, fighting. Commonly spending all their pay quickly. Sailors on slaveships thow made little if any money and were routinely whipped/beaten, often dying of disease or thirst/starvation. Their bodys tossed overboard. Slaveship captains had financial intrest in keeping slaves alive but not sailors. Slave merchants wer savy business men who let sailors run credit. Being illiterate drunks they could not know the truth of their debt (DISCOVERY), which were greatly exaggerated, often fabricated. The merchant then offered the sailor a term aboard a slaveship to pay it (time served). If a sailor became wize to the scheme, or slaveship realitys and tried to refuse the offer. The merchant would have the police throw them in jail untill debts were paid. With no way to pay. The jailor would only release the men if onto a slaveship (Plead guilty). Trading a land dungeon for a floating one. "With specious arts subdue'th unwary mind, then close their web and fast their victims bind, with debts fictious charge their case, and make a dungeon stare them in the face." — James Field Stanfield.

AKA - This middleman struggle strikes chilling likeness to agencys PDA/OPA that courts appoint to represent the accused poor. Not including courts or police, but just the Alaska Department of Corrections is 400+ million per year. As with illegal drugtrade its driven by money. But the poorer you are, the more you pay. — Yo Trippin Blalock
"But you have dishonored the poorman. Are not the rich the ones who oppress you, and drag you into court?" — James 2:6
